Representing Family in East Asia Television Drama: China, Japan and Korea

This paper analyses how television dramas in Korea, Japan, China, and Taiwan, portray family relationship. It investigates the questions of how TV representations of families relate to actual families in these four countries and what can be learnt from these representations about society and ongoing social changes. A number of differences between Japanese, Korean, Chinese and Taiwanese family images result from the analysis. While Japanese TV dramas tend to represent the ‘post-familial family’, Korean TV dramas cling to more traditional family ideals. TV images of Chinese families exhibit a higher degree of gender equality than the other two.

Taken together the TV dramas examined in this project shed light on the often discussed dichotomy of individualism vs. collectivism and its connection with Western societies, on one hand, and East Asian societies, on the other. It can be demonstrated that the collectivism of East Asian societies is not an aggregate of a single nature and that family is not the most essential value in those societies as generally argued. Therefore, when interpreting modes of representation of this sort, it is important to take into consideration the particularity of modernization process and the material condition in each society.
