Moments of Misunderstanding: Intercultural Approaches to Nonverbal Behavior in Japan

The traditional way of learning a language is to learn its grammar, vocabulary and pronunciation rules. In real-life linguistic interaction, however, there are many nonverbal clues to communication that need to be taken into account as well. This is particularly true in the case of Japan, where such non-verbal clues are commonly considered to be of essential importance in everyday interaction.

In my presentation I will work with the concept of “cultural osmosis,” referring to exchanges of cultural properties such as food or architecture. I show how these objects may lead to misunderstandings in intercultural settings, in that remaining differences between the original item and the imported one will not be recognizable anymore. Furthermore, I will argue that nonverbal communication in Japan is to a great extent motivated by common Japanese thinking concerning (unwritten) law contexts, relating to a general understanding of publicity and privacy.

My argument is based on two smaller empirical studies on Japanese knowledge of Western nonverbal behavior and a collection of moments of misunderstanding between Japanese and Westerners from non-fiction literature.
